

THE TORY PARTY COOKING SHOW

By: John Anastasakis & Angel Fourlas

Characters: Presenter

Presenter: Welcome, dear Tory fans, those who haven't committed suicide after the devastating election results, to our cooking show. A show that has devoted itself to helping the hard-working middle class housewife decide what to cook for her hard-working middle class manly husband. On today's episode we'll show you how to cook a gorgeous desert: a deconstructed British cake, which would very likely reflect on Tory party's policies.

We start our recipe by gathering all our needed measurements. Remember, we have to be tidy and organized, although we're going to fuck it up somewhere in the process. We start by throwing in our bowl a strong foundation of flour, a sprinkle of tax reduction, 200g. of immigration policies and one egg. (Breaks egg out of the bowl) Oh, shit! Well, that was unexpected, but fear not. The Tory party has exceptional talent in handling messed up situations, very likely because of its experience. (Grabs the egg and puts it back in the bowl). All done. Tory voters and cooking enthusiasts, it is now time to bake our cake. Place it in preheated oven, that is the House of Commons, and bake until it looks red and also a bit sad. (Graphic which says: 4 years of negotiations later) Ta-da! Now our cake is indeed a bit sad and deformed. That is easily fixed though. Just market it as a "deconstructed British cake" and all is good. Spread some icing and sprinkle some sprinkles, and I guarantee no one is going to care about the initial issue.

That was today's episode of the Tory Party Cooking Show broadcasted exclusively by BBC, our beloved. See you until the next episode, where Rishi Sunak will prepare a special old-fashioned British chicken curry served with mashed peas and fried fish heads. Until next time, keep up voting for us and being poor!

The End